Editor's Message

Last year, we actively pursued publications beyond the usual technical reports to bring more diversity to the Environmental Health Review pages. These articles were in addition to the usual contributions of journal article reviews from Nelson Fok, branch updates, the President's message, and of course the technical reports that are the staple of any professional journal.

We began the year with a special edition that included four evidence reviews. Throughout the year, we had papers on the emerging issue of food allergens, the National Collaborating Centre for Environmental Health have amended their submission to focus on a topic of interest, and commentaries about the future of public health and other topics of professional concern. Hopefully, this diversity not only increases the interest among the profession, but also highlights the reality that information can be shared using many different formats.

Recently, I have been part of a few conversations across Canada where the need for more public health evidence is required. This might be especially true in environmental public health. The more information we continue to publish, the more we can share stories about successful or interesting environmental public health practices. This increases the knowledge level of all involved.

We are continuing to seek high quality articles for publication, so please keep them coming. We hope to have the Environmental Health Review included in various aggregators such as PubMed once we have a critical mass of peer-reviewed articles published.

Andrew Papadopoulos
Editor-in-Chief