Many deserved celebrations are being planned or are already underway to commemorate the 100th anniversary of CIPHI. It is quite amazing that a volunteer organization representing public health inspectors across Canada has been active for a century.

This anniversary has sparked some thoughts of reflection and has initiated others to recall the history of our organization. In this issue, Gene Hart and Klaus Seeger take us through a history of our crest. Tim Roark has just completed the full amalgamation of the Environmental Health Review (up to Winter 2010) and its previous incarnations The Canadian Sanitarian and The Newsletter. All these issues now reside in digital format. This huge effort took Tim eight years to complete – an effort that we are all very grateful for.

I would like to encourage others to share their experiences of the past and let us learn about our history. I would also like to encourage members to share thoughts about the future. Please consider submitting an article to the Environmental Health Review on the future of our profession. This can be in a case study format that explores a practice, a technical article that explores the evolution of the profession, or a commentary piece that expresses a point of view on a subject within our profession.

Anniversaries are a great time to reflect on past successes and challenges. It is also a time to look forward and set new directions.
