Editor's Message

It has been said many times that the only thing that is constant is change. The field of environmental public health is certainly not exempt from that particular adage. I for one always look forward to change, and I am curious to see how evolution plays out. I must admit though, I am much more comfortable if I have a role in determining the future.

One of the things I was most excited about taking on the editor position with the Environmental Health Review was the ability to try and create a public discourse around the future of our profession. With this in mind, I reached out to many leaders within environmental public health and asked them to provide their perspective on our future. I left the direction very broad but I wanted these leaders to think about our profession, our environment, and how we might be able to position ourselves in the future to better our profession and enjoy even more success.

In this edition we have Dr. Tim Sly and Ron de Burger providing us with their perspectives on the future of environmental public health. I would encourage all recipients of this journal to read those commentaries as well as the article on branding public health and to consider sending in their own commentary supporting, building upon, or providing a different perspective on how we may grow as a profession. Of course, you must read the excellent paper on a trichinellosis case in southwest Ontario as well.

It is this type of public discourse that will allow us to continue to evolve and remain in control of our evolution, all the while enhancing our profession.

Andrew Papadopoulos
Editor-in-Chief